If one price is good, are two better?
A framed field experiment on price discrimination

Andreas Leibbrandt
Monash University

Many sellers exercise power over the prices for their products and price discrimination is an important pricing strategy. However, while some forms of price discrimination appear common, others are difficult to observe. I present a novel experimental framework to investigate the occurrence and reaction to price discrimination in different information and market conditions.